For dating relationships
free of CYBERVIOLENCE

04

Many behaviours associated with cyberviolence in the context of a dating relationship are considered crimes in Canada.

These are some of the charges that young people who adopt such behaviours may face:

“ Uttering threats

Threatening a person with death or bodily harm is a criminal offence. These threats may also be made against property and animals, for instance, threatening to break a cellphone or poison a dog. They may be made in person, in a text message, on the telephone, on social networks, or through a third person.

“ Criminal harassment

Constantly following a person without their consent (e.g., going to their home or waiting for them outside class), repeatedly sending threatening messages (e.g., via social networks, texting, or email), surveilling them, and adopting a threatening attitude (e.g., banging the wall in front of them or making intimidating comments) are behaviours that could be considered criminal harassment. The person being targeted is made to fear for their safety or for the safety of someone they know.

“ Extortion

Trying to obtain something by using threats or violence is a criminal offence (e.g., “I’ll post your photo if you don’t give me money.”)

“ Harassing communications

Repeatedly communicating with a person, or ensuring that the person receives multiple messages with the intention of harassing them (e.g., “Where are you?” “Who are you with?” “What are you doing?”) is a criminal offence, regardless of the means of telecommunication (social networks, email, or telephone) used.

“ Child pornography and publication of an intimate image without consent

Production of child pornography (e.g., video or photographs), distribution (e.g., showing and/or sending it to friends), possession (e.g., having photos or videos on your cellphone or computer), and accessing intimate or sexually explicit content of a minor, with or without their consent, is a criminal offence. Also, sharing an intimate photo of a minor person (for instance, in which her breasts are visible), with or without her consent, is a criminal offence.

PSST!

Young people share nearly 1 out of 2 sext messages!
